

WOMEN IN THE 20S

The Roaring Twenties was a big time for women. There were many new laws and regulations that women were allowed to participate in. The three biggest changes to women in this time period was their expression, their ability to vote, and their work possibilities. Although women had more rights they were still imprisoned. Women were finally starting to be recognized more but still with some rules.

One of the biggest words in the 1920's was flapper, this word was used as a term to describe the women. A flapper would be a woman that was really flashy, tomboyish, wore more makeup, and skirt hems were higher. The flapper was really only an image, not many women really fit the description. Along with the flapper image another big step to the women population was their right to vote. On August 18th women were finally included in the people that had the choice to vote, even though they finally had the option many women did not vote because of how people felt about it. Just like voting women had the opportunity to get involved in higher paying jobs, yet businesses were still prejudice against them. Women were becoming a bigger part of the country yet with some regulations.
